Admissions Tests

12 months before starting with your studies

Most American Universities require their prospective students to take one standardized admissions test (SAT® for Undergraduate and GRE® for Postgraduate studies) and sometimes you will be required to take a subject test depending on your field of interest. For specific Graduate Studies such as Law of Business a special test for these fields of studies needs to be taken. Moreover, the TOEFL® is required for non-native applicants at many American colleges and universities.

Admission Dates

9-12 before starting with your studies

The admission date for the fall semester is usually December the previous year. However, this does not apply for all universities and it is therefore best to check this information with the institution you want to enroll in.

Notifying Universities

2-4 months before starting with your studies

Once you have chosen the university you want to enroll in, notify them about the decision you have made and send all of the documents they require. Do not forget to send letters to the universities you have been admitted to, but have decided not to attend.
